Michael Cates, who owns about 7 percent of Lululemon, has filed a series of shareholder resolutions since December accusing the company of wasteful spending, its board's role in fundraising for the company's CEO and company management's compensation. Cates said in an interview the company was not doing enough to protect its reputation against claims of "mistreatment of women" and said he wanted more active women on the board. "They really can't put their heads in the sand. It's time that they start being a little more transparent and more pro-active. We need to send a signal to the shareholders that we are serious and we have got some questions," Cates said in an interview. "The company is well-compensated and independent. I think it should be fairly easy to ask that question," he added. The Lululemon board said in a statement that it was "determined to protect Lululemon's independent brand" and would continue to make "good faith, appropriate responses to Mr. Cates' shareholder resolutions." "We believe that Mr. Cates' shareholder resolution against the company is misguided and we remain steadfast in the belief that Lululemon is the best place to build the long-term success of our company," the board said. Lululemon shares were down 2.5 percent in early trading.
