Graviteam Tactics: Shield of the Prophet Verdict

Long-time fans of Graviteam Tactics have basically everything they could wish for: a great arrangement of excellent scenarios

Pros:

- This feels like the real thing: Simple graphics, adrenalin and cinematics. The importance of strategy, planning and tactics is underlined.
- The mechanics work. The combat log and the display of military artefacts in the base camp are essentials.
- Classic gameplay. But also modern expanded abilities and a fantastic plot.
- Multiple difficulties allow versatile games. You can play through the classic casual or the balanced mode.
- Different heroes and new hirelings are included. This enriches your customization options significantly.
- Excellent scenarios. 10 thoroughly planned scenarios.

Cons:

- There is a little mention of the story in dialogues, but you get the essential of it with the main characters and their speech balloons.
- It is not clear what a citizen soldier is in the third mission. It is kind of a downside if you need to have knowledge about work skills before starting the game.

The game can be tough for new players. It usually requires some dexterity to be played. At times I found myself frustrated and stopping mid play. Also, the "Beep" became very annoying. I did think the font's size could be decreased with more spacing between each word. Overall Gameplay: Can be challenging in the beginning. What's new in End Of Realms:

After the recent release of the first Modern Masters pack, its touted release date, and a monumental success all in the span of a few weeks, people are finally taking note of MtG's newest problem: Modern Masters. The game has drawn focus away from some of the most cherished, beloved figures from the game, namely, Abrupt Decay and Jace, the Mind Sculptor. Gone are the days of post-board control decks - Griselbrand, Jace, Serra Archangel, Triskelion - much like the glory days of the "off" Colors. So, not only do we have a problem with Vintage being overshadowed, we also have a problem in Modern. We also have a problem. Mastodon is a problem. It essentially killed all the fun of these pairs like Jace/Griselbrand and Abrupt Decay/Serra/Tribal. And suddenly, the nostalgia of the previous format is gone. Jace was once a staple of the format, with Griselbrand and Teferi being next to him. And fast forward to today, where we have over 500 cards out of print thanks to the long absence of the card from Magic Online. I believe the main reason modern day players continued to play even past G2M15, even after the format previously being replaced by Vintage, is that there were many reasons to play, and they were all somewhat satisfied within Modern. Modern has it's own subformat, called the White Weenie's. White Weenie's is fast and powerful, with main decks comprised of cards such as Master of Waves, Sultai Emissary, Abrupt Decay and two copies of haste for Trinisphere and Sword of Fire and Ice. White Weenie's seeks to be a powerhouse for 4 color control and a splashing red for the hexproof mana denial. Most decks are very aggressive, having applications of Abrupt Decay to snap back a creature during its sacrifice. Modern is also still embracing its parallel(ish) format or Vintage, the Workshops format. Workshops decks are basically game 1 control lists that snowball into a sharp and lethal deck in game 2 and 3. Workshops decks are fairly rigid. This is due to the relatively limited toolbox available to Workshop decks. Stax decks are extremely resilient. When you have main and sideboard game 1 the control deck, the game is over very quickly. There are only so many counterspells,
