PROJECT SUMMARY: Integrating Animal Models of Autism Spectrum Disorder and Drug Development Proposal We have established the Autism Drug Discovery Center (ADDC) as a collective of multi-disciplinary researchers with an exciting, track record of research with relevance to autism spectrum disorders (ASD). We will leverage our experience and tools to accelerate drug discovery in this area. Our goal is to validate the relevance of different ASD-associated brain alterations, such as changes in levels of the neurotransmitter serotonin (5-hydroxytryptamine, or 5-HT), as therapeutic targets for ASD. There are available mouse models of ASD, and some provide support for disrupted 5-HT signaling. However, mice exhibit a wide range of behavioral abnormalities aside from ASD symptoms, making them less than ideal models for preclinical testing. We recently established an alternate ASD mouse model which lacks the 5-HT transporter gene (Slc6a4), and exhibits a combination of behavioral and neurochemical features characteristic of ASD. Our initial studies indicate that 5-HT reduction in the prefrontal cortex (PFC) is sufficient to elicit symptoms of ASD, with deficits in social interaction, and impaired working memory/cognition. These behaviors are specific to 5-HT, and cannot be normalized by reversal of the SERT-deficiency. Our data support a working model of ASD-related 5-HT deficits in which low 5-HT levels in the PFC contribute to the cognitive deficits observed in ASD. We have also developed a behavioral test battery that can be used to classify different syndromes in ASD, and applied it to mice with a SERT knockout. This test battery enables us to reliably identify mice with autistic-like behavior, which we will use for preclinical testing of candidate 5-HT agents. New drug leads resulting from the preclinical testing will be compared to existing pharmacological treatments, in terms of their effects on targeted symptoms, and, where indicated, their impact on cognition or 5-HT levels in the PFC. Our preliminary studies also show that the SERT-deficiency in mice leads to widespread deficits in cortical actin, a cell signaling and structural protein that is linked to ASD and other neuropsychiatric conditions. Restoration of cortical actin was sufficient to normalize motor behavior, another behavioral symptom of ASD. These findings support a multi-system/multi-tissue hypothesis of ASD, in which disturbances in different aspects of behavior are linked to disruptions of common cell signaling mechanisms. We are developing novel methodologies to assay for cortical actin in Optical and parametric imaging of bacteria. The ability to localize and study bacteria and other microorganisms in situ in the environment is of great importance for the prevention of human and animal disease. In this review, we describe the optical imaging techniques that have been used to monitor bacteria in situ and discuss the use of in situ imaging techniques to optimize environmental controls and monitor antimicrobial treatment in the environment. The need for optical imaging techniques to evaluate the effects of antimicrobial treatments on the dispersal and survival of bacteria in the environment are also discussed.igitalmedisys.com/" onclick="javascript:_gaq.push(['_trackEvent','outbound-article','my-article','outbound-click']);" href="">Ver.
