Managerial Economics Professor Craig Petersen and Managerial Economics Professor W. Drew Lewis have written the fourth edition of their classic text, which is often rated as the best undergraduate textbook in the field of economics. A thiazole compound which is a derivative of 5-fluorouracil has been known to exhibit excellent anticancer activity and is now in clinical use as an anticancer agent such as 5-fluorouracil (FU) itself, gemcitabine (registered trademark) and the like. The 5-fluorouracil derivative which is a compound having a thiazole group as a substituent at the 2-position is, as disclosed in Patent Document 1, an excellent anticancer agent having a wide range of anticancer activity and a high safety profile. Moreover, a 5-fluorouracil derivative having an indole group as a substituent at the 2-position has been known to have stronger anticancer activity than a 5-fluorouracil derivative having an acetyl group as a substituent at the 2-position. Moreover, as disclosed in Patent Document 2, it is effective to combine a 5-fluorouracil derivative which has an indole group and a substituent group which is able to increase the anticancer activity such as a heteroaromatic group.

Lewis .Q: What is the difference between ConfigureAwait(false)
and Task.ConfigureAwait(false)?
My understanding is that either of these should be used to ensure that the current context is not abandoned during await. What is the difference between these two statements? What is the difference when used in ASP.NET MVC? await userManager.UpdateAsync(user);

await userManager.UpdateAsync(user, false);

A: If you wait on an asynchronous method, you are just asking the runtime to continue executing the current method and throw the results of the async operation back to you, likely in the form of a Task. The only difference between the two calls is that the first explicitly states that the continuation to the method will not result in a task running asynchronously and will not use the Async and Await keywords. You can read more about `ConfigureAwait(false)` on MSDN.
